Description

Upstate Theatre Project was founded as an independent, community-centred theatre organisation in July 1997, following almost a year of research and road-testing. The company has enjoyed outstanding success over its first five years, presenting - in the words of the Arts Council's quarterly newsletter 'Art Matters' - "a diverse range of fully professional theatre in Drogheda, the North East and beyond".

Upstate is located in Drogheda, County Louth, an ancient town steeped in history, and now in the hands of a young, vibrant and increasingly multi-cultural population. Less than an hour by road, (or half-an-hour by train) from Dublin, Drogheda is a major gateway to the border counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Cavan. Upstate's work draws not only from the life and culture of the town and surrounding area, but also from this wider border region, an area rich in literary and theatrical tradition. The project is also ideally located to develop links with colleagues and communities across the border in Northern Ireland.

Upstate seeks to attain the highest standards of excellence in its new writing and artistic productions, while breaking new ground in its innovative relationships with community organisations, its educational and training programmes and its links with artists and communities in Northern Ireland and overseas.
